A Message from Jeffrey Rich: Alumni Are Our Strongest Ambassadors

Aloha HPU Alumni!

As Hawai'i Pacific University continues to grow and evolve in today's competitive higher education landscape, one thing remains constant: the power of our alumni community.

As the University's Chief Communications Officer, I have the unique privilege of helping tell the HPU story every day through campaigns, social media, media relations, digital content, and community outreach. But no story is more compelling than the one told by you, our graduates.

You are the living proof of the value of an HPU education. Whether you're making an impact in healthcare, technology, education, business, public service, or the arts, your achievements and your voice carry weight. When alumni proudly share their experiences and recommend HPU to prospective students, it amplifies our reach and strengthens our brand in ways no advertisement ever could.

That's why I want to personally invite you to get involved in helping HPU continue to thrive. Here are some easy and powerful ways you can support the university...

personal growth, it was a move that would ultimately support her rise to the top of Hawai'i's local television landscape.

"It was a logical degree for me to continue and expand my knowledge of the industry," Lockwood said. "It was super helpful, and I wouldn't be in the role I'm in if I didn't have my degree from HPU."

Today, Lockwood is President and General Manager at KHON-TV in Honolulu, where she leads one of Hawai'i's largest media organizations. Her career spans decades and includes key leadership roles at KITV, KGMB9, and Cox Media. But before she was managing teams and transforming media strategy, she was balancing long workweeks with full days of Saturday classes and Thursday night lectures at HPU.

"There was no online school at the time, and it was hard to find programs that accommodated working adults," she said. "I feel very fortunate that HPU was available. It was tough, but I'd do three or four classes at a time, take a break when I burned out, and then pick it back up again until I finished."

Lockwood's educational experience was unique, defined more by tenacity than tradition. Still, she found the curriculum immediately applicable to her job and career growth.

"Speech, marketing, communications—it was all relevant," she explained. "It grounded me in ways that were important because I was in the workforce young, working with people much older than me. HPU helped me develop both personally and professionally."
